

T-shirt creator aims to help kids go green

Monday, November 12, 2007

It might seem odd to sell organic okra alongside T-shirts for tots, but that's what Whole Foods at Patriot's Plaza in Mount Pleasant is doing.

Meghan Stein-Webster, a Steel City native who currently lives in Mount Pleasant, created a children's clothing line called eco-generation that made its debut there Saturday.

Touting the slogan "Get on board. Fight global warming," the duds display powerful designs promoting an eco-friendly lifestyle.

Charleston is the first of five cities across the U.S., including New York, Los Angeles, Boston and San Francisco, to carry the brand, exclusively offered at Whole Foods through the end of the year.

Come 2008, pieces from the earth-conscious new clothing line will hang on the racks of high-end boutiques across the country and also will be available online at www.eco-generationkids.com.

Stein-Webster created the line to empower and motivate youth to speak out against global warming.

"They will be the ones ultimately affected by the decisions our society makes," she said.